From Laurence Olivier and Judi Dench to John Boyega, The Old Vic has always attracted the best creative talent since it first opened its doors in 1818. Under the leadership of Artistic Director Matthew Warchus, The Old Vic continues to entertain, educate and inspire, through an exciting and varied program of work that reflects the theatre's rich history.

The American Associates of The Old Vic (AAOV) has been instrumental in supporting the work of this extraordinary institution and is a 501 (c) (3) non-profit organization. AAOV plays an important part in forging transatlantic partnerships that enable American work to be seen in London and British work in the US. Unlike other non-commercial theatres in the UK, The Old Vic receives no regular public subsidy and yet, with the help of the American Associates, The Old Vic can continue to produce adventurous and thought-provoking plays, dance, music and spectacle and invest in talent development, education and community.

‘If the point of life is to improve it, to make something about it better, The Old Vic does this through the power of telling and listening to stories. Stories stimulate our minds and bring people together. They connect us across nations, across class, across generations. They encourage tolerance and dissolve prejudice, and promote empathy in an increasingly fractured world.

There are, of course, many ways to make life better. But at The Old Vic, we strongly believe theatre to be an indispensable and unique force for good that needs to be supported, shared and upheld’

Matthew Warchus, Artistic Director
